

When Textualism Divides the Texas Court

JULY 14, 2021

This article was originally published by Texas Lawbook. Any opinions in this article are not those of Winston & Strawn or its clients; the opinions in this article are the author's opinions only.

Winston & Strawn Houston Dallas Associate Dylan French discusses the recent Texas Supreme Court decision in Hogan v. Zoanni, a defamation case that focused on what it means to “maintain” an action under the Texas Defamation Mitigation Act. Despite the Court’s commitment to textualism, the justices were unable to agree on a correct interpretation of the Act. The rare 4-1-3 split led to a plurality decision announcing the court’s judgment, while leaving the state of the law unclear.

“Hogan provides a unique chance to consider the approaches to statutory interpretation among the current justices and the practical effect of a Texas Supreme Court decision without a controlling majority,” Brandon said.

Read the full *Texas Lawbook* article \(subscription required\).

1 Min Read

Related Locations

Dallas

Houston

Related Topics

Texas

Related Capabilities

Litigation/Trials

Related Regions

North America

Related Professionals

---

Dylan French