

Spain Data Breach Law Goes Into Effect, Cookie Consent Requirement Also Updated

APRIL 12, 2012

Spain has recently amended its privacy laws to require notice when there has been a breach of electronic networks or services. The amendment to the country's telecommunications law also now requires use of adequate security measures to protect electronic networks and services. In addition, the updates take into account the EU Directive that companies must get consent prior to putting cookies on users' computers.

TIP: These new requirements serve as a reminder to US companies that breach notice and security obligations exist outside of the U.S.
