

Under New Management: What to Expect from a Trump NLRB

FEBRUARY 21, 2018

Winston & Strawn's Labor & Employment Practice presented an eLunch titled "Under New Management: What to Expect from a Trump NLRB" on February 21, 2018 at 12:15 p.m. Central.

For a few brief months in late 2017, the five-member National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) operated at full-strength and with a Republican majority for the first time in a decade. The "new" NLRB's case outcomes were consequential, and included reversals of several perceived pro-labor decisions from the prior Obama NLRB. Then, Chairman Miscimarra's term expired in December, and the NLRB settled back into a 2-2 equipoise. Looking ahead, employers will likely not wait long for another shift in the NLRB's political make-up, as President Trump's latest nominee, Republican John Ring, awaits confirmation by the Senate.

Partner Bill Miossi reviewed the NLRB's late 2017 flurry of activity, and discussed likely issues and agenda items to be taken up by the Trump NLRB in 2018.
